Attributed to Frederick Hintz, who along with the better known John Channon were leading proponents in London of the German and French style of brass inlaid furniture of the time. Hintz worked from premises at 'The Porcupine', Newport Street near Leicester Square, London during the mid 18th century and is recorded at this address from at least 1738.

This rare table is in solid mahogany, the top lobed with ten co-joined indentations all inlaid with brass stringing, centered with a brass strung pentafoil panel; the voids ornamented with engraved brass and mother-of-pearl foliate and leaf inlays typical of the works attributed to Frederick Hintz; the column support with ring turning above a wrythen knob over a tripod base, the knees with shell and bell-flower carving, each leg elegantly pierced and terminating in elongated ball and claw feet. The definitive work on this form is
