The design for the chairs illustrated in Thomas Sheraton's Cabinet Dictionary

, published in 1803

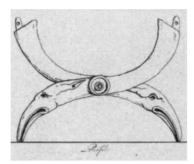

A pair of chairs of the same model, differing only in the design of the feet, were sold at Christie's New York on the 16th of April 2002

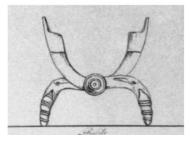

These exceptional chairs are very much in the taste championed by a small group of connoisseurs whose figurehead was the Prince Regent, later George IV. The architect and designer Charles Tatham popularised the "x-frame" or curule style of chair with his publication

Etchings of Ancient Ornamental Architecture

, published in 1799, which included illustrations of 'Antique Seats executed in Bronze from the Collection in the Museum at Portici' (illustrated in a composite image below)

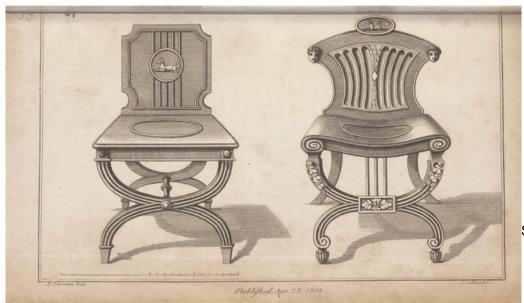

These designs in turn influenced the great furniture designers of the time and it was Thomas Sheraton in his

who provided the design from which the present chairs are taken.

This is a particularly successful design-the combination of carved detail, unusually sinuous lines for the period and fine brass lion's head mounts is an arresting one. Hall chairs were designed, as Sheraton himself states in the same publication, to be as much a statement of wealth and taste as they were as practical pieces as they were only sat upon by visiting tradesmen and servants-higher-bred visitors would have been shown directly in to the drawing room of a house. These chairs would have made the perfect impression, conveying the wealth and fashionable taste of their first owners.

HALL CHAIRS, are such as are placed in halls, for the use of servants or ftrangers waiting on business .-They are generally made all of mahogany, with turned seats, and the creft or arms of the family painted on the centre of the back. See plate 51.

Surviving examples of this model are very rare indeed and it is possible that only two pairs survive. One pair were sold at Christie's New York in 2002. A pair of the same model had previously been illustrated by another great dealer, Jerome Phillips of Phillips of Hitchin Ltd, in an advert in Country Life in 1984. It is highly likely that this is the same pair of chairs but it has not been possible to confirm by close comparison of the images whether this is definitely the case. In any event, our pair were supplied to the previous owners by the important dealers Jeremy Ltd of London-one of a small number of dealers who helped to pioneer the taste for regency furniture in the early to mid 20th century in London.

The chairs retain an excellent colour and patination.

Attributing these chairs to a particular maker is difficult given that they are so closely related to a published source that would have been in wide circulation. That having been said, the extremely high quality lion's head mounts are very reminiscent of those used by the makers Marsh and Tatham on a series of well-known pieces such as a desk attributed to the firm which is now at Anglesey Abbey in Cambridgeshire.
